Dear Michael,

Designation of the European Community

The Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has noticed that Ministers have used a variety of titles for the European Community: the European Community, the European Economic Community, the Communities. You might like this short note on the law and practice.

Strictly speaking, there are legally three separate European Communities (the European Coal and Steel Community, the European Economic Community and the European Atomic Energy Community) founded on three separate Treaties. The Merger Treaty of 1965 created a Commission of the European Communities and a Council of the European Communities (the Assembly or "Parliament" having become common to the three Communities in 1957) but the Communities themselves were not merged. All these terms are still used in formal, legal acts.

However, the Council has formally endorsed the use of the term "the European Community" for most other purposes. This practice has also been adopted within the UK Government.

For general use, therefore, "the European Community" is the most appropriate term. From a political point of view in Europe it is better than the "European Economic Community", the "EEC" or the "Common Market", which sound to our partners restrictive and limiting in spirit, if not in fact.

A

Provided the Prime Minister and Home Secretary have no objection, we will also encourage the BBC and other media to use the term "the European Community".

- I hope we shall sound personable about it

I am copying this letter to the Private Secretaries of the other members of OD(E) and of the Paymaster General and to the Secretary to the Cabinet.
