Status of the Invasion

1. Radio reports indicate that two hospitals in Mar del Plata have been eyacuated and their roofs reinforced to accommodate Argentine, and perhaps British, wounded airlifted in from the islands. Many of the civilians apparently assisted in defending the island, and press and other sources report continued resistance to the invasion forces from Royal Marines and citizens

Comment:

The Argentines may have downplayed the level of Marine and islander resistance to the invasion force. By underestimating the actual level of casualties, Buenos Aires may hope to minimize international reaction to the invasion and enhance the image of their military capabilities. Confirmed reports of additional British casualties would place more pressure on Thatcher for a quick response.

Poor roads and unfamiliarity with the rugged terrain will hamper operations against resistors, but exposure could reduce the ability of the Marines to harass the Argentines.

Comment:

The Argentines could be initiating ship withdrawals to home ports in anticipation of what they believe to be the imminent arrival of British submarines. Apparently Buenos Aires plans to keep their submarines in the area, perhaps even after other ships have departed.
